In 1997 Los Angeles experienced a massive power blackout following an earthquake. The entire city was thrown into 11. The emergency call service, 911, was overwhelmed with panicked residents reporting “a giant silvery cloud” in the sky.

The callers did not realize that they were seeing the Milky Way, the galaxy 12 our solar system, in the night sky for the first time. Some of these city people had never before experienced a sky unpolluted by light.

Light pollution results from excessive light produced by humans at night. One of the most common 13 of light pollution is sky glow. It refers to the brightening of the night sky 14 artificial sources, mainly electric lights from houses, offices, factories, cars, streetlamps, billboards, and buildings, turning night into day for people who work and play long after sunset. People living in cities with high levels of sky glow have 15 seeing more than a handful of stars at night. Up to 80% of the world's population now lives under light-polluted skies, meaning a third of humanity can no longer see the Milky Way.

You might have heard the expression “raining cats and dogs.” The origin of the expression might be linked to the city of London in the 17th century. At that time, the streets of London were filled with stray animals. When the streets flooded after heavy rains, those animals, 16 cats and dogs, would be seen floating down the streets, as if they were raining down from the sky. It is unlikely to see a rain of cats and dogs in real life. 17, in some places, there has been “rain” of fish, frogs, and other animals or objects. There are reports of strange rain with snakes, seeds, nuts, stones, and even golf balls. This actually happens more often than you think. People throughout history have been 18 by the strange rain phenomenon. Scientists can explain some strange rains though: An unusual rain of animals or objects is usually caused by a tornado. A tornado 19 things from the ground in its violent path, travels with the things for a distance, and then drops them in another spot. A small body of water such as a lake or a pond could also be 20 up into the air, along with fish and other species in there, by the tornado. This “water tornado” carries fish or frogs from a pond and “rains” them down in another place.

Conflict is an inevitable, and even healthy, part of any relationship. It is impossible to expect people to agree on everything all the time. Since relationship conflicts cannot be avoided, learning to deal with them in a healthy way is important. When a conflict is not managed well, it can cause damage to the relationship. But when handled in a positive way, conflict can provide an opportunity for growth, which may strengthen both personal and professional relationships.

Conflict arises from differences, both large and small. It occurs whenever people disagree over their values, ideas, or desires. Sometimes these differences seem insignificant, but when a conflict triggers strong feelings, a deep personal need is at the core of the problem. This is the need to feel safe and secure, to feel respected and valued, or for greater closeness and intimacy. If you do not understand your own emotional needs, you will have a hard time communicating with others. As a result, a conflict or an argument between you and another person may not be easily resolved.

In the workplace, conflicts and disputes are often caused by differing needs. When you begin to recognize and understand conflicting needs among coworkers, you can open the door to creative problem-solving, team-building, and improved relationships. Once a workplace conflict is resolved, mutual trust will flourish, and this in turn will increase productivity at work.

How can you resolve workplace conflicts? Four skills are essential. First of all, you need to manage stress while remaining focused and relaxed at the same time. Only when you stay calm can you read and interpret verbal as well as nonverbal communication accurately. Secondly, control your emotions and behavior. When you are aware and in control of your emotions, you can communicate your needs without threatening or scaring others. Thirdly, pay attention to what others are trying to communicate to you. You need to also be aware of the feelings expressed by others. Finally, be respectful of differences. Try to avoid disrespectful words and actions. People will only be open to communicate with you when they feel respected.

By practicing the above four skills, you will have the ability to take conflicts in stride and resolve differences in ways that build trust and confidence. These practical skills will not only improve your personal relationships but also your workplace relationships, which may lead to improved work performance and productivity.
